

Degrees in Hygiene At Tulane Next Year

Dr. Creighton Wellman, dean of the School of Tropical Medicine and professor of hygiene, yesterday announced that Tulane will have next session a department of hygiene outside of its medical department, which course will lead to the acquirement of degrees of master, bachelor and doctor of hygiene.

Dr. Wellman spoke before the Tulane Summer Normal School yesterday morning and classes were suspended during his lecture, which proved unusually interesting and instructive, and attracted so large a crowd that many could not obtain admission into Gibson Hall, which was uncomfortably crowded.

Hygiene does not merely consist in textbook knowledge the speaker showed, but in actual and practical experience in life also. While much of this science lies within the scope of the physician, there is much of it that lies outside of this scope. While the prevention of the transmission of disease is a portion of medical hygiene, there is, it must be remembered, the hygiene of the home, industrial and engineering hygiene, which are entirely separate from the province of medical hygiene.

Interest in the subject is broadening and improving, Dr. Wellman said, and where five years ago it was not possible to get any one to listen to a talk on hygiene, it has now become very popular.

The registration at the Summer Normal continues to increase, and each day sees new applicants for enrollment.

Miss Geck, supervisor of primary instruction in Cincinnati, has inaugurated her classes in child training. Special exercises will be held on Sunday evening, plans for which will be announced later.
